Compelling others to believe?

Earlier this month, I was preaching from Luke 14 about Jesus' parable of the Great Feast where the servant goes out into the streets and countryside to compel people to come. Is this 'compelling' approach an appropriate form of evangelism today?

Rohan Silva was a Marxist postgraduate at LSE when he read the philosopher Karl Popper and found his entire belief system overturned. Everything he had thought about human motivation was wrong. "It was a night of genuine epiphany. Popper was saying that human behaviour and society were more complex than we can comprehend. I felt this safe edifice with all the answers falling away. People smarter than me had caused damage and pain through enacting Marxist belief."

It was a painful experience for Silva because everyone he knew was on the political left. "My friend remembers me saying, 'I still believe everything I did about poverty, but now I'm on this other side.'" He lost friends. Years later he became an adviser to David Cameron but remained uneasy about being labelled a Tory.

This experience shows how disruptive changing core beliefs can be, risking the loss of certainties, identity and groups. It's not surprising we're reluctant to accept new views when we might lose so much in exchange.

In The Influential Mind, neuroscientist Tali Sharot writes, "Data has only a limited capacity to alter the strong opinions of others. Emotions usually override them because our survival for millions of years has depended on trusting our fears, hopes and desires. Our brains are built to prioritise them. Data came later."

Dismissing facts that threaten our existing understanding is practical. In a world bursting with data it would be impossible to examine all counter-evidence. On average, says Sharot, we are right to believe what confirms our views because data that contradicts what we already know about the world is unlikely to be true. Elephants are not pink, cars do not fly, Mars bars aren't a healthy lunch!

What makes data even less convincing is that there is now a surfeit of it, validating any position. Our brains get a thrill every time they encounter a supportive fact. Our mistake is to expect that thrill to be replicated in our opponents, when in fact scans show our brains literally slow down in an attempt to bypass unwelcome information.

What then works? A shock causing reassessment can be transformative, sweeping old certainties away: politicians' failure to agree a form of Brexit, personal crisis, finding common ground, understanding others' concerns rather than insisting they adopt ours. Frontal attacks are pointless because mental barriers go up. So with the Gospel, compel carefully, sincerely, humbly, honestly, respectfully and prayerfully.

Responding to Lent

Give up plastics

Use less plastic over Lent. This is the message from the Anglican Communion's Environment Network. They have produced a set of daily challenges, which include going for large sizes of shampoo, requesting retailers to use zero plastic packaging & implementing a 'No more bottled water & cool drinks' water policy at church & home.

Canon Rachel Mash, Environmental Co-ordinator for the Anglican Church of Southern Africa, called attention to the fact that only 10–13% of plastic items are recycled worldwide. "The nature of petroleum-based disposable plastic makes it difficult to recycle and they have to add new virgin materials and chemicals to it to do so.

Additionally there are a limited number of items for which recycled plastic can be used. Petroleum-based plastic is not biodegradable and usually goes into a landfill where it is buried or it gets into the water and finds its way into the ocean. Although plastic will not decompose into natural substance like soil (biodegrade) it will break down into tiny particles after many years (degrade). In the process of breaking down, it releases additives that were used to shape and harden the plastic (toxic chemicals) which make their way into our food and water supply. These toxic chemicals are now being found in our bloodstream."

Bishop Thomas Oommen, Moderator and Primate of the United Church of South India, endorsed the green message, saying. "If we live a life committed to avoiding all kinds of disposable plastics, the manufacturers would be forced to avoid all disposable plastics, and we would be contributing towards a lesser carbon footprint. If Lent is a time we think about how to foster life rather than destroying life, it is our spiritual commitment to avoid plastics since it 'kills' life. As I hope that Lent would be a meaningful time to reflect, repent, reorient and rededicate our lives to accomplish God's will, I ardently pray that God would enable all of us to continue our life in an eco-spiritual pilgrimage fighting against all causes of ecological catastrophes, particularly the disposable plastic catastrophe."
